PREFACE

THE collecting of books for what is now the Library of the Arnold Arboretum was begun in 1874, when I obtained a few standard works needed in planning the Arboretum and arranging its collections. This small library was gradually increased, and when a few years later it was determined to prepare at the Arboretum an account of the trees growing naturally in North America it was found necessary to secure many additional volumes on dendrology and descriptive botany essential to the production of that work. The number of volumes had increased to six thousand in 1892 when, accommodations having been provided for a library at the Arboretum, I presented them to the University.

In addition to the contributions which I have been able to make to the Library, it has received some important gifts. The first of these, made by the late Charles James Sprague of Boston, contained a number of valuable books chiefly relating to North American botany, and including a number of the early papers of Asa Gray, which even thirty years ago were extremely rare. In 1905 the late Francis Skinner of Boston (H. C. 1862) placed in my hands a substantial sum of money for the purchase of books for the Library. After his death his son, Francis Skinner of Dedham, continued until his death in 1914 to make generous gifts of money to the University for the purchase of books for the Arboretum Library as a memorial to his father; and Mrs. Sarah Choate Sears of Boston has for several years made it possible by important gifts, to add to the Library a number of rare books published before the middle of the eighteenth century.

In the formation of this Library particular attention has been paid to books relating to dendrology, general descriptive botany, the cultivation of trees, the works of travelers in which appear descriptions of trees and of general features of vegetation, and in obtaining complete sets of the periodicals in all languages relating to botany, forestry and allied subjects. Except when it has seemed desirable to complete the collection of the publications of some of the most distinguished botanical authors no attempt has been made to place in the Library books relating exclusively to herbaceous plants, as the Arboretum was established for the cultivation and study of trees and shrubs. Little attention has been paid to books relating to the description and care of the fruit trees usually cultivated in cold countries, for such pomological books are found in libraries devoted to horticulture. Attention, however, has been paid to books relating to the history and cultivation of trees and shrubs valued for special products, like tea, coffee, cocoa, oranges and their allies, cinchona, olives, the mulberry in its relation to the manufacture of silk, and others because little attention had previously been paid in this country to such books, and it seemed desirable that the library of an institution like the Arnold Arboretum should contain all books in any way relating to woody plants, with the exception of those which are most valuable in a purely horticultural library. For this reason many books relating to forestry, especially those descriptive of the early efforts at forest management in this country and Europe, will be found in the Library, although the Arboretum is a museum for the study and display of trees and shrubs and not a school of forestry.

Only a few books on paleobotany, vegetable pathology, physiology, entomology, and landscape-gardening are found in this Library. These are subjects which should be more fully represented in a library intended to furnish the best possible opportunity for the study of trees, but the Arboretum Library has grown so rapidly in other directions that it has not been practicable to pay to these subjects the attention their importance demands.

To the preparation of this catalogue Miss Tucker has devoted ten years, during which the Library has grown from ten thousand to thirty thousand bound volumes. A second volume of the catalogue is in preparation, in which, to facilitate the use of the Library, the books will be arranged according to the subjects of which they treat.
